Instead, I felt self-conscious about my appearance and struggled with hair that was as difficult to manage as dry grass in winter. Eventually, I stopped combing it altogether. I'd wash and dry it, put on a simple outfit, and head off to school, feeling awkward and unsure of myself. And to top it all off, I had knockknees and large feet! Despite my academic prowess, I felt like an outsider - Miss-ugly-top-of-the-class at our big high school in the Eastern Cape. However, there were moments when things looked up, like when Bulelwa would come and study with me under the black wattle tree near the teachers' cottages. She was an incredibly talented singer who could bring people together through music. Gcina Mhlophe highlights the significance of small acts of kindness and love in transforming someone's life.
